I recently counselled a South African student who was very interested in doing a Bachelor of Arts in Philosophy at Columbia University in New York. The dream of international education genuine and earnest. However, the thought of moving to New York from Cape Town, 7 time zones from her family, immediately following matric seemed daunting. Settling for a UK or European university that is on the same time zone, and postponing Columbia for a potential postgraduate option, looked like a much better option.

There is yet another possibility! What about going to Columbia University, when you're 20, not 18? Does that feel less intimidating? What about attending TWO world class universities and getting a BA from each in four years? The ultimate solution: The Trinity College Dublin and Columbia University Dual BA Program. This is an opportunity like few others that necessitates further exploration!
